Charles Carroll

Born in Glasgow in 1943. studied Business Management at the University of Strathclyde and qualified as an Industrial Engineer. I worked in several areas of industry in Scotland before moving to Guyana to work for a large conglomerate in the Sugar and related industries. On returning to Scotland I worked for various companies as an Industrial Engineering Manager and Works Manager before deciding to emigrate to South Africa in 1975.

The first company I worked for in South Africa was the National Productivity Institute where I eventually became a Regional Manager and Director. Several years later I moved to private industry providing implementation consultancy services where my people skills were often tested in getting companies to change their strategies, methods and systems of working to achieve higher profitability levels. For the last 10 years of my working life I, and my partners, had our own management consultancy company working across a wide array of industries. The work was carried out not only in South Africa, but in South America, USA, Canada and other African countries. This meant dealing with different problems and different cultures.

I enjoy sports, chess, reading, music and socializing. I am also a great believer in team working and understand that different opinions does not mean we can't achieve a better result.
